

Back when Boudreaux was but a boy he attended the one room school house on the bank of the bayou. He was not a model student, he sat in the back of the room and frequently napped.

One particularly hot and sticky September afternoon the rest of the class listed to a lecture on early European history while Boudreaux snoozed in the back. At one point Boudreaux started snoring loudly - this was too much for the teacher.

"Boudreaux! Wake Up!", the teacher yelled.

"Who me? I weren't sleepin", Boudreaux protested.

"Yes you were. You slept through both the religion class and the history class", the teacher declared.

"No, I was awake", Boudreaux claimed.

The exasperated teacher challenged Boudreaux, "Then you can prove it by explaining the difference between Noah's Ark and Joan of Arc".

"Yeah, well", Boudreaux started, "De biggest difference was dat Noah's Ark was made of wood and Joan of Arc was maid of Orleans".
