

The teacher called on Little Boudreaux. He dutifully stood up beside his desk.

"Now if your mother gave you 25 cents, and your father gave you 25 cents, and your uncle gave you 25 cents, what would you have?" the teacher asked.

Little Boudreaux counted on his fingers for a bit, then crossed his arms and stared at the floor for a couple of minutes.

"Come on. Surely you can figure out a simple problem like this," the teacher said.

"Ain't simple at all," Little Boudreaux said, " I could have a coke, or a bag of tater chips, or a candy bar. I like 'em all - it ain't easy."
