

Boudreaux was working as a watchman in the American History museum in Washington DC. The job was easy, mostly watching to make sure the kids didn't break too much, giving directions to the restrooms, and occasionally answering a simple question.

"How old is that arrowhead?" a student from a tour group asked.

"Dat particular arrowhead is 12,005 years and two months old," Boudreaux announced.

"That answer is awfully exact. Are you sure about it?" the teacher leading the tour asked.

"For sure. You see I axed dat exact same question when I started here. Da Director told me twelve thousand years - dat was five years and two months ago," Boudreaux explained.
