

The National Security Agency wanted to debrief Boudreaux as he returned from an oil field job in Iraq. They took him to their headquarters and scheduled a 4 hour interview.

It only took the interviewer 30 minutes to determine that Boudreaux didn't know anything about anything. The agency guy got a lot friendlier after that - they still had three and a half hours to kill - but conversation was difficult..

"Dat sure a nice computer you got dere," Boudreaux said at one point to keep the conversation going

"Oh yes, this little baby is voice enabled, has fingerprint authentication, and accesses the agency data base - you could say it knows everything," the agency man bragged.

"Dat sure is something. Can I test it?" Boudreaux asked.

"Sure we got some time to kill. Place your finger right there," the agency man said.

Boudreaux placed his finger on the sensor pad. "Good morning Boudreaux," the computer said, "Do you have a question for me? Do you want to 'ax' me something?"

"Oh dat's good," Boudreaux said, "Yeah, I gotta question for you. Where is my father right now?"

"Satellite imagery indicates that your father is currently fishing in Barataria Bay," the computer answered.

"See it don't know ever thing. It just made a mistake," Boudreaux told the agency man, "My father died twenty years ago."

"No Boudreaux, you are mistaken," the computer said, "Your mother's husband died 20 years ago. Your father just caught a nice red fish."
