

Boudreaux's boy, "Tee" they called him, was having trouble in school. He just wasn't putting in the effort to study and make the grades. Boudreaux decided to have a father-son talk to shame the boy back onto the right track.

"Shame on you Tee. You're making de family look bad. You just gotta do betta boy. You're shaming de family," Boudreaux began.

Tee hung his head and muttered, "Yeah, I know."

This encouraged Boudreaux so he went on, "Shame on you for not studying boy. Did you know dat when he was your age Abraham Lincoln spent half of every night studying his books by candle light? You're study habits are shaming de family."

"Yeah, I knowed dat," Tee replied showing some defiance, "I also knowed dat by da time he was your age he was president of the United States. Now who's shaming de family?"
